The indices and orientations of CdSe/CdS(2)-coated, poly(bisphenol A carbonate) (PCB)-functionalized, self-assembled monolayers (SAMs) were investigated using ¹H NMR spectroscopy and low-temperature scanning tunneling microscopy (LT-STM). The functional monolayers were prepared via the SILP technique (SAMs formed from precursors injected into a subphase) to form SAMs on- and off-substrate. The indexes of the SAMs were changed by varying the duration of the SILP treatment, and revealed the feasibility of forming reversible SAMs. The orientations of the functionalized QDs and the subphase were then probed using LT-STM. The STM images displayed d(n)/d

Stone Roses manager speaks at the LCCN conference Published: Monday, March 2, 2013 at 11:00 AM. LANSING — He was either a fool or a genius, depending on who you asked. From the outside looking in, the move of Stone Roses frontman Ian Brown to North Dakota in 1994, under the auspices of the Center for Land-Grant Education, was bound to fail. There is only so much pine trees and farmer's markets a person can take. But the University of North Dakota's Northern Plains Center for Land-Grant Education gave Brown a chance to make his dream of an agricultural university a reality. And his project, the Sustainable Agriculture Center at the university, is taking off, gaining traction with the state's agribusiness community and helping farmers throughout the state. He's just sad that the Roses broke up because the band would never have progressed enough in North Dakota to survive without him. "I think they needed to have broken up to do some of the stuff they wanted to do," Brown said after a keynote speech at the Land Conservancy of North Carolina's Land Conservancy Conference on Monday in Lansing. He then ticked off the projects that the band members and their new project, the Stone Roses ReGeneration, have accomplished since they reunited in 2010. "A lot of the things we wanted to do never happened because of the band and the fact that people were not willing to put in the time," Brown said. Brown says he felt a "solid sense of satisfaction" when he had to step away from the Roses in 1994 after a North Dakota promoter offered him a "ridiculous amount of money." "The deal was for $550,000 up front, plus another $400,000 when the band was 'sold' to California," he said. "I was not going to get into anything that I was being
